How to configure netgear ac1600 router

Visit Netgear Support, put in your (actual) model number ("R6260"), and look for Documentation. Get the User Manual. Look for "Use the Router as a WiFi Access Point Only". > The piece of the puzzle I can't figure out is how to log in the ac1600> without doing a factory reset. [...] When configured as a wireless access point, the R6260 will have a non-default LAN IP address, either a dynamic address supplied by the DHCP server in the main router ("Get dynamically from existing router"), or else a static address which you specify ("Use fixed IP address (not recommended)"). In the latter case, you'd know which address you gave it. In the former case, you'd need to ask the main router which address it supplied, typically available from some kind of "Attached Devices" or "DHCP Clients" report. > [...] With DHCP disabled on the AC1600. [...] It sounds as if you're using an ad hoc WAP configuration, rather than the WAP-mode option built into the R6260 firmware. (In that case, you would want to avoid the WAN/Internet port on the R6260.) > [...] The IP address for the AC1600 has been changed to avoid conflict with the router connected to PC#1. [...] "changed" to what? How/where, exactly, did you configure this different IP address for the R6260? You should be setting its LAN IP address, not its WAN/Internet IP address. > [...] Using the IP address or routerlogin.com does not get me to the login page. I get a page stating I need to be connected to the router> (it is connected to the internet). As usual, showing actual actions with their actual results (error messages, LED indicators, ...) can be more helpful than vague descriptions or interpretations. Copy+paste is your friend. If the actual error message said something like "You may not be connected to your Router's WiFi network. [...]", then welcome to what may be the worst error message in the world. For an explanation, try: That failure of a "routerlogin" name would be expected for an environment where the main router is not a Netgear router. I'd expect the LAN IP address of the R6260 to get you to its management web site from anywhere on your LAN, but some complications are possible. If your client device is connected to the R6260-as-WAP, then the R6260-as-WAP may be able to intercept a "routerlogin" name, and handle it itself, but, if your client device is connected to the main router, then you can expect problems with any "routerlogin" name. > [...] BTW I am out of my comfort zone at the minute. [...] That may change. The critical thing about a WAP is that it's all-LAN. (The special WAP mode option configures its WAN/Internet port essentially as an extra LAN port.) The router functions of the WAP are disabled, so it acts as a simple network switch (with wireless capabilities). Need More Help?
